

Storage costs and depreciation are only problems if ivory is sold to poached creatures who are accorded rights on the basis that they are still wild animals.
man through one-off schemes such as the 1999 sale to Japan.
The suffering caused can be unnecessary and prolonged, especially in the case of large animals.
are needed to prevent further international harm.
None of this is remotely
not conflict with conservation.
Furthermore, noise pollution
dream of a white Christmas.
we must continue to support farming
and should be restricted to the confines of a zoo.
In fact farming animals is much more humane than the actions of the market.
For all these reasons
